Frank Herman, the Boy Hero of the Upper East Side.

HIS is the thirteen-year-old lad who, as told in the Journal yesterday, jumped into the East River, on Wednesday afternoon, and drew from the water lit-tle Joseph Pesek, who had fallen overboard while riding in a toy wagon on the pier at the foot of East Seventieth street. So modest was young Herman about the affair that it was impossible to obtain his name until yesterday. Frank lives at No. 517 East Seventieth street. His father is dead, but his mother has remarried, and Frank lives with them. He went to school until two years ago, when he secured employment in the Admiral Cigarette Factory, at Fifty-second street and East River. There he worked for twenty-one months, until three weeks ago. Since then he has been looking for something else to do. He was playing ball on a vacant of opposite his home, which is the house nearest the river on that street, when the little Pesek boy fell overboard. At once everybody began to scream, but no one made an effort to save the child. Frank heard the noise, and started toward the pier, divesting himself of his coat as he ran. As he reached the water's edge he saw the child go under the second time. He jumped near the spot, and as the little boy came to the surface a third time he threw his right arm about him. He grasped the clothing with a firm grip and then swam a distance of twenty feet until he and his burden reached the shore. The Pesek boy, as was told yesterday, died in an ambulance wille being taken to the hospital. Young Herman, while employed in the cigarette factory last year, on different occasions saved two boys from drowning by plunging into the river after them. When seen yesterday he said: "If I had saved the boy's
